For some reason, the iPhone has tons of different voice recording apps, but very few of them are anything more than Apple's free voice memo app. We just like press records because we manage to make ourselves worth their demanding price by offering different experiences and features than Apple offers. Just press the recording platform: iPhone (and iPad/Apple Watch/Mac) Price: $4.99 Download PageFeatures One Tap Recording in app. You can share notes with Notification Center, or other applications that support audio or text transcription for multiple languages with support for home screenCloud backup and sync punctuation commandsNote is a fully searched Mac application ($4.99) unlimited for desktop sync, unlimited recording time when allowing backing time if your device switches to another application, multitasking support on iPad just press the big record button will show. Press the button and the app will start recording. It is simple, fast and easy. In addition to that, Judd Press Records does everything to simplify the process of recording audio notes. This means that you can record notes immediately from the lock screen as a widget in Action Center, with a hard press on the icon on the home screen, or right from the Apple Watch.Just Press Records is also the only option we find to include transcription software, and while it's accurate as a voice dictation from Siri, it's a welcome addition nonetheless. If you're the one person who speaks clearly into the iPhone's microphone, it just does a solid job at press record transcription, but it does get muddy if you're trying to record a group of people. Transcription is not only useful for converting speech to text, so you can search for voice recordings like a word document. Just by this, you create a lot of voice memos and if you're not interested manually, there's a price value. Them. Where it falls short, only the ability to edit features that are missing compared to other options that are just a press record edit. Depending on why you use voice recording software, it can be a deal breaker, but if you need a way to create quick notes or record lectures, you generally don't need editing. Just Press History also assumes you want to search for transcription to find what you're looking for and doesn't offer much in the organization's way other than putting files in a date-specific folder. This can be a deal breaker for anyone who wants to organize their files in a certain way. At $5, just press records are expensive, but transcription makes the cost of the item well worth it. There are tons of voice recording apps out there competing, most of them don't offer much more than Apple's own voice memos (free) apps. With it, you can quickly record notes, trim them down with a lightweight editor, and catalog them however you see fit. If that's all you need to do, then there are a lot of free applications already on your phone. Voice Recorder (free/$1.99) is easily the most popular third-party voice recording option in the app store and is a solid application for anyone looking for a slightly upgraded version of voice memos. It provides the basics including unlimited recording time, basic editing and the ability to loop audio. Moreover, it has several solid organizational options, including organizing recordings into an existing folder structure. If just tap record transcription and search capabilities are not interesting to you but still need more than voice memos, voice recorders are also a solid in-between addition to some excellent organizational tools. If you don't need a dedicated voice recording app, Evernote (free) and OneNote (free) have voice recording options to add voice recordings to your notes. This is great for students who record lectures or take notes about meetings. The recording process for both is a little buried, so unless you're already using either app for notes, they're not just valuable for audio notes. Alone.
